We are focused on the health and safety of our licensees, employees, families and communities. In alignment with public health authority guidance, we have implemented physical distancing protocols and elevated cleaning procedures to limit employee and customer exposure to the virus.

I would like to thank all our licensees, industry representatives and employees for their dedication and hard work as we prepare to navigate tomorrow's challenges. We will continue to find ways to enhance service, increase revenues and reevaluate the operation for effective ways to better serve the citizens of Alabama. AGAVE IS GOOD TO GO

Tequila and Mezcal Are Poised for More Growth

BY KYLE SWARTZ

Note: This excerpt is printed with permission from the Summer 2020 issue of StateWays—the Beverage Alcohol Merchandising Magazine for Control States.

Tequila and mezcal remain red hot. Both spirits tap into numerous trends that should keep the categories very much on the minds of consumers in 2020.

Recent growth has been impressive. And it was good enough to capture 8 percent of the overall U.S. spirits market in 2018. No doubt, tequila and mezcal both have bright futures. They are in the middle of a boom period, with no imminent end in sight.

Quality Tequila Sells

What's the top tequila trend in 2020? It remains premiumization. Top-shelf expressions have become best sellers.

"People are willing to pay those prices on an everyday basis for what tequila they drink every week," explains Jeff Feist, category lead, spirits and more, for BevMo!, which counts more than 100 stores. "Premium tequila is no longer just a special occasion."

Mixology has obviously helped drive this premium

tequila and mezcal boom, as has the health-conscious movement. "We see consumers trying different cocktails as well as tapping into agave-based spirits for a 'healthier' alternative to sugary mixed cocktails," says Eric Dopkins, CEO of Milestone Brands, which is behind the flavored tequila line Dulce Vida. "The skinny margaritas seem to be developing and gaining in both on-premise and off-premise consumption as consumers seek less carbs and calories."

AUTHENTICITY MATTERS

The level of consumer interest and experimentation that began with American craft whiskey has continued into tequila. "Consumers are increasingly more interested in the ingredients and history behind their drinks, and they are gravitating toward higher-end tequila as the availability of quality options continues to grow," explains Christina Choi, SVP of tequila, Diageo NA.

In the day and age when everybody carries a smartphone, there is no hiding the facts behind a brand. Tequilas can no longer conceal their ingredients or distilleries. An educated, curious consumer will check.

"A lot of connoisseurs will notice if a tequila's denomination number is off," says Mike Moreno, of Moreno's Liquors. "Some companies will change distillery to save money, which can negatively impact the flavor profiles, so people really want to know now where their tequila comes from."

INTEREST FROM BLANCO TO AÑEJO

One of the more interesting aspects about tequila consumers is that in seeking authenticity and quality, they do not necessarily reach for the priciest bottles. "I think people are trending toward tequilas that showcase agave flavors, and they are not as interested in the profiles of the barrel finishing," Moreno adds. "Though you will always have people interested in the añejos and extra añejos. I don't see that drastically slowing down, but I do see a blancos trending with a massive uptick."

Ask a tequila fan their favorite style, and you may be surprised how many will answer reposado. This middle tier typically spends 2 to 11 months in oak.

CRISTALINO OR AÑEJO

Look across the tequila shelves these past few years, and you'll notice that the color is disappearing from añejos, More companies have released cristalino variants, which filter the barrel color out of the spirit for a clear, aged product. This trend began in Mexico and has moved up north into America.

"We sell several cristalinos that are doing very well," Feist reports. "But it's tough to get drinkers of authentic tequila into these products because they believe that in stripping out the color, you're also losing some of the flavor."

Another issue is the price point. Remember, these are still añejo tequilas. "There's no such thing as a entry-level cristalino," says Feist. "These are priced between $49.99 and $59.99. It's not like a new brand of tequila that can come out at $29.99 and be successful."

"The consumers I see who prefer añejo would rather it retain its color," says Oniel Mendenhall, Jr., owner and president of the Fiesta Beverage Mart & Liquors chain. "I think a lot of that has to do with what their father, grandfather, or someone older has taught them. They tend to think the clear is just a more expensive blanco/silver or it will not have the wood notes like a colored añejo."

MEZCAL IN 2020

Thanks to bartenders and curious consumers, mezcal is poised for further growth in 2020. But at what cost?

Perhaps more than any other alcohol category, sustainability remains a concern for mezcal. The rarer agave varietals, which often take longer to blossom, are not so easy to farm sustainably, especially with mezcal demand spiking. "Preservation remains a hot topic," says Moreno.

"What I believe is next for mezcal in 2020 are flavors, like tamarindo, coffee, passion fruit, etc.," says Mendenhall. Which all speaks toward the need for greater education in the category.

LOOKING AHEAD

One of the driving factors behind this agave wave has been the cross-cultural appeal. As that continues, expect an even broader consumer demographic reaching for tequila and mezcal. "Add it all up, and there's ample room for growth and excitement with tequila and mezcal," says Dopkins.

RIDE THE AGAVE WAVE

Increase your profits by helping your customers explore the uniquely refreshing tastes of tequila and mezcal. The more familiar tequila is made only with blue Weber agave that is oven-steamed before being distilled in copper pots, while mezcal can be made with many different types of agave that are cooked over wood and charcoal fires in pits lined with lava rocks before being distilled in clay pots.

To fully experience the distinct aromas and flavors of these increasingly popular spirits, encourage your customers to sip them as is before mixing them in specialty drinks or favorite cocktails.

9 VODKA TRENDS IN 2020

BY KYLE SWARTZ

Note: This excerpt is printed with permission from the Summer 2020 issue of StateWays—the Beverage Alcohol Merchandising Magazine for Control States.

Vodka is still the king of the spirits. For all the press around trendier categories such as whiskey or tequila, vodka retains the sales crown. It represents about one-third of spirits volume nationwide. And vodka is still growing. The category was up a respectable 1.2 percent in sales in 2019, according to the Beverage Information and Insights Group, with domestic increasing 2 percent.

This year, the COVID-19 crisis will likely strengthen vodka's reign. Retailers across the country report customers reaching for vodka, especially larger-format bottles. Consumers want to stock up on well-known, versatile spirits, and vodka seems well suited for the current environment. With that in mind, we look at nine trends defining the category in 2020.

DOMESTIC MEANS QUALITY

In years past, U.S. consumers looked at imported vodkas as luxury items compared with domestic brands. If you wanted to splurge on vodka, you did not buy American. That attitude has changed, of course, as the craft spirits movement produces high-quality vodka at home.

"With such a wide spectrum of styles, origins, terroir, and flavors available now in American-crafted vodka at a great value, consumers give equal respect to domestic vodka that they used to give imports," says Britt West, VP/GM of spirits for E. & J. Gallo Winery. This company is behind New Amsterdam Vodka, a 2020 Growth Brands Award winner.

The operative phrase in West's observation is "great value." That is how many modern American brands have attempted to stand out in comparison with imported counterparts.

AMERICAN-MADE MARKETING

"The biggest change in vodka over the last handful of years has been the shift in consumer attention from super-premium imported vodka to premium domestic vodka," says Matti Anttila, Founder and CEO of Grain & Barrel Spirits. "Most notably, this has been led by Tito's."

"The phenomenon of Tito's, you cannot ignore it," says Andy Mansinne, VP of brands at MGP [Midwest Grain Products] Ingredients. "It's a key category driver."

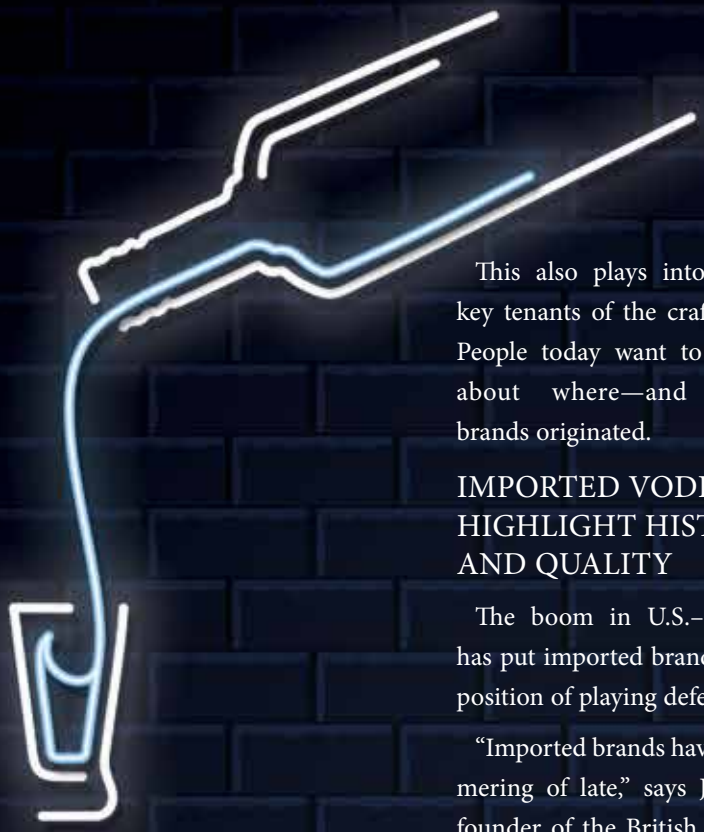

Country music star Blake Shelton helped launch Smithworks Vodka in 2016, with branding that clearly signals "American-made."

MGP's Till Vodka is another example. With distribution growing steadily across the country, Till proudly celebrates its U.S. ingredients and heritage. It's distilled from wheat sourced from Kansas farms. "Using only wheat gives us the smoothness and creaminess that the American palate is asking for," Mansinne explains. "This offers unique qualities, even in a colorless and odorless spirit." The brand name invokes American culture—a till is a classic farming implement. "It harkens back to hard work, integrity, and family—qualities we try to invoke with Till Vodka."

REGIONAL BRANDS EMERGE

Overall, the vodka category has benefited from the movement toward craft, regional and local, which we had first seen in craft beer," says Anttila. "We wanted to create a brand that you could call your own, whether you were in Jacksonville or Baton Rouge or anywhere in between. Just because we're a Southern brand doesn't mean we can't be relevant broadly. People like the idea of the South. It speaks to ideas of civility, hospitality—things people appreciate."

This also plays into one of the key tenants of the craft movement. People today want to know more about where—and how—their brands originated.

IMPORTED VODKAS HIGHLIGHT HISTORY AND QUALITY

The boom in U.S.–made vodka has put imported brands in the odd position of playing defense.

"Imported brands have had a hammering of late," says James Chase, founder of the British brand Chase Vodka. "However, we are seeing some interest back at the 'top end,' and some bartenders are seeking out quality vodkas that offer a great story and, of course, taste of something unique."

It's in these stories where imported brands find their differentiation. With such broad history behind them, imported brands can tap into trends new and established. "Imported vodka brands can attract American consumers' attention by capitalizing on Millennials' interest in cocktail culture," says Simon de Beauregard of Absolut Vodka and Pernod Ricard USA. "Vodka's mixability has helped make it a key ingredient in many craft cocktails, and the premium quality of many imported vodkas fits the ongoing premiumization trend."

THERE'S ROOM FOR MORE CRAFT BRANDS

With all this new emphasis on heritage and region, quality, and craft, we can envision a long runway still ahead for the vodka category, and higher growth means more brands. "There are currently 900 million bottles of vodka being sold each year," points out Steve Bellini, EVP of business development for New Zealand's Broken Shed Vodka. "That is a staggering number, and it makes me chuckle when I hear people say there are too many vodka brands. I say count your blessings because the vibrancy within this category is essential to our industry."

"You had a lot of larger brands doing traditional things from the old days and not being creative," says Patrick Shorb, cofounder of Holla Spirits." This innovation deficit has allowed for the emergence of more creative brands.

FLAVORED VODKAS RETURN

Flavors are back in style—but with a new craft focus. Their craft components—using all-natural ingredients rather than sugary enhancements—have connected with modern consumers. "There's a definite shift away from artificial flavors," says Anttila. "We're looking for delicious, authentic, all-natural flavors."

HEALTHIER, SUSTAINABLE VODKA

The rise of all-natural flavors follows another trend from the other alcohol categories: healthier consumer lifestyles. People care more now about what goes into their bodies.

"We know consumers are looking for a balanced lifestyle, so we're exploring ways to provide convenient, on-the-go options to best fit our consumers' active lifestyles," says Jaymie Schoenberg, VP of marketing for Svedka Vodka. The brand envisions additional packaging options in the future to attract consumers already accustomed to canned beer and wine, RTD cocktails, and Tetra Paks [carton packaging].

Running alongside this healthier lifestyle trend is the sustainability movement. Consumers who count their calories are also likely to care about which brands operate in an eco-friendly manner.

Less Distillation, More Flavor

Consumers today seek maximum variety in flavor, experimenting across brands and categories. For that reason, some vodka brands may move away from distilling numerous times in order to retain unique characteristics.

VODKA GROWS DURING THE PANDEMIC

Consumer purchasing patterns have changed. More people now buy simple items in bulk. This has prompted, at least in the pandemic's initial period, a purchasing spree on large-format vodka.

Whether consumer interest in large-format vodka stays sky high remains to be seen. Regardless, vodka offers high-quality brands—flexible in shots and cocktails—that consumers already know and enjoy.

"Just because we aren't drinking in bars and restaurants doesn't mean we are willing to compromise on quality. Better spirits simply taste better and enhance imbibing experiences," says Tad Dorda, founder and CEO of the Polish brand Chopin Vodka. "We also see that people are getting back to the basics, whether it be on the rocks, a martini, or a simple-yet-delicious cocktail made with minimal ingredients found in their pantries and refrigerators. I think we will see this trend continue even more as we move into whatever the new normal is."

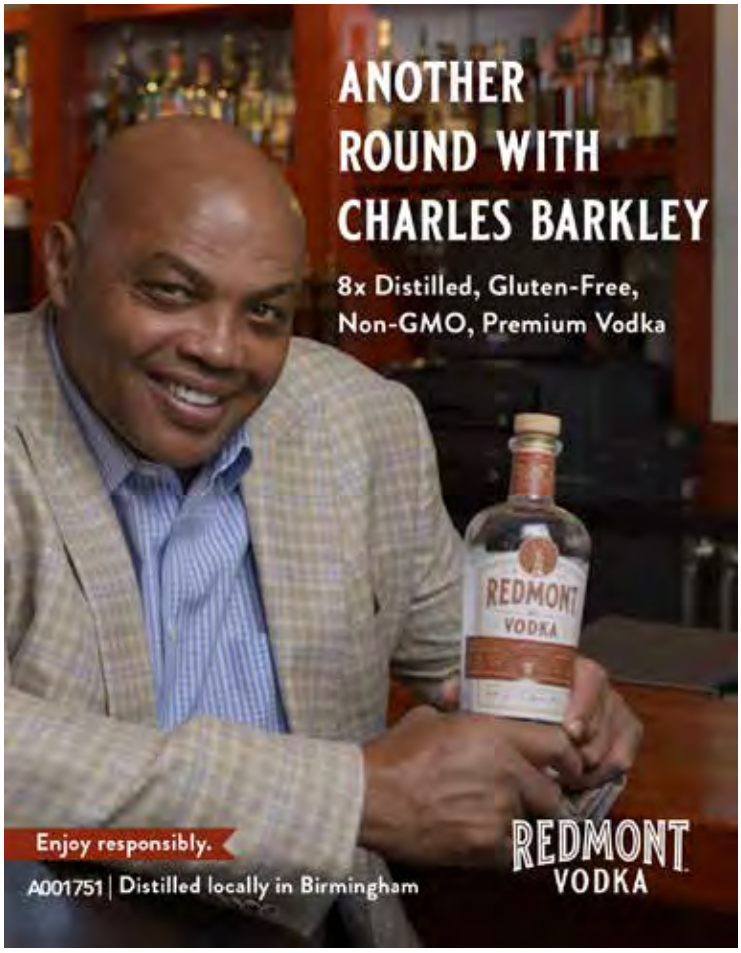

VODKA—PERFECT FOR GIFT GIVING AND MIXING

Take full advantage of the current consumer purchasing trends to promote premium, high-quality, authentically-flavored vodkas made in the United States with natural ingredients using eco-friendly production methods. Encourage your customers to consider purchasing high-end bottlings for holiday gifts as well as special taste treats for themselves.

Suggest they enjoy sipping these delicious spirits on the rocks as well as in shooters, mixed with any number of juices and carbonated beverages, and in their favorite cocktails.
